Participating in the M.Phil. in Film Studies: Screenwriting at Trinity was so valuable in helping me find my voice as a writer. The program offered me the opportunity to learn from top notch storytellers, broaden my horizons both technically and theoretically, and create lasting bonds with my fellow classmates — known now as my favourite collaborators.

The organisational design of the new institution was influenced by Oxford, Cambridge and continental precursors, but from the beginning it was an autonomous corporation governed by 'provost and fellows', committed to teaching and to scholarship, the first and (as it turned out) only college of the degree-awarding University of Dublin. The College site, lying some distance east of the small walled city, was far larger than the small community of fellows and students required, and the first brick buildings of the 1590s occupied only a small part of what is now Front Square. But from the beginning the College's library was a priority, and the energy with which early Trinity scholars (notably Luke Challoner and James Ussher) assembled the initial collections of books marked Trinity out from other sixteenth-century foundations. Many of its early graduates, well grounded in
