

PIP88172 — The Ethics of Group Action

Module Information
Module Code	PIP88172
Module Title	The Ethics of Group Action
Department	Philosophy
Module Personnel	Rowan Mellor
Academic Year	2026-27
Credit Weighting	10 credits
Semester	Semester 2
Contact Hours	2 lectures per week

Module Content
Module Description	Many of today's most pressing social problems are not the result of what any one person has done, but are rather the product of many people acting together. In this course, we will study philosophical questions raised by the interconnectedness of contemporary life. These will be split into three themes. First, we will consider questions about the nature of group action, e.g., What it takes for several people to act together, rather than merely side-by-side? Can groups constitute agents in their own right? Second, we will examine the ethical questions posed by group action, e.g., What does it take for an individual to be complicit in a group wrong? Do I have a moral reason not to contribute to collectively caused harms, if the difference my action makes is negligible? Finally, we will consider questions surrounding the concept of solidarity, e.g., What does being in solidarity with others require of us? What, if anything, is morally good about solidarity? What role can the concept play in the analysis and delivery of social justice?
Module Learning Aims
Learning Outcomes	At the end of this module students will:

Module Content

	• Have detailed knowledge of key contemporary texts in the philosophy of group agency, moral complicity, and solidarity • Be able to critically evaluate the arguments of these texts • Be able to apply these ideas to contemporary social problems such as the climate crisis.
Indicative Reading / Resources

Assessment

Assessment Components	1 essay 100%
Assessment Details

Additional Information

Prerequisites	None
Co-requisites	None
Any other information	