| Module Content                     | The variety of terms used to designate the 'Hebrew Bible' (e.g., Old Testament, Hebrew Scriptures, Tanak) indicate the richness of traditions related to these writings, the various ways that they are viewed, and also their life within different communities at different times. This module will orient students to the literary and theological contours of the Hebrew canon, introducing them to the rich variety of genres within. The lectures will focus                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. Demonstrate familiarity with the content of the writings that form the New Testament, their structure, and the main historical and cultural factors that contributed to their development.</li> <li>2. Discuss the complex process of the formation of the New Testament and identify the diverse traditions that are represented in it.</li> <li>3. Identify main trends in the history of interpretation of the New Testament and its exegetical traditions both in the academic study of the New Testament and in popular culture.</li> <li>4. Analyse the main models of investigation of New Testament literature (e.g., historical-critical, narratological, feminist) and the key methodological issues concerning the study of the New Testament and its origins.</li> <li>5. Illustrate scholarly views about the New Testament to both specialists and non-specialists, writing well-structured essays, and compiling and using relevant bibliographies.</li> <li>6. Formulate an independent and personal understanding of the New Testament and its history of interpretation as a foundation for further studies in religion and theology.</li> </ol> |
| Module Content                     | The writings included in the canon of the New Testament have been composed by different authors over a relatively long period of time. Translated in countless languages, the stories and ideas found in the New Testament have played a major role in shaping socio-political, ethical and religious discourses across the centuries and in different cultures and have been a constant source of inspiration in art, music and literature. In this module, students will learn about the most relevant scholarly approaches to the study of the New Testament and its background in Second Temple Judaism and in the Graeco-Roman world, examine the variety of literary genres and the diversity of sources and traditions, which contributed to the development of early Christianity and to the formation of new religious and                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

| Module Learning Aims                      | The module will offer an introduction to theology by means of reading of selected texts, critique and discussion. Key questions will be addressed, such as the doctrine of God and creation, theodicy, human flourishing, the problem of violence, the inclusion of theology as a subject in the modern university.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                               |                     |                   |                 |
| Module Learning Outcomes                  | On successful completion of this course, students will be able to <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• appreciate the historical development of theological discourse</li> <li>• discuss the challenges for theology in the modern period</li> <li>• develop strategies for academic reading and skills in academic writing</li> <li>• present and investigate these concepts and interpretations in class and in a written assignment.</li> </ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                               |                     |                   |                 |
| Module Content                            | The module examines key questions in the theological tradition. The students will be introduced to the richness of theology as a discipline, and the content will address the question of the nature of theology as an academic subject within the university.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                               |                     |                   |                 |

| Module Learning Aim            | This module aims to introduce the student to the distinctive academic discipline of theology and to stimulate their interest in the academic wealth of this tradition. It introduces students to groundbreaking texts in the Christian tradition and teaches them to “read for” chronology, meanings, ideology, rhetoric, empire, capital, patriarchy, anthropology, and ecology.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                        |              |            |          |
| Module Learning Outcomes       | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Discriminate between theological and other academic approaches to the study of religion.</li><li>• Analyse primary texts in terms of gender, race, and class, intersectionally.</li><li>• Identify the context in which texts were written.</li><li>• Compare and contrast different methods/approaches within the discipline of theology.</li><li>• Debate and articulate core theological positions.</li><li>• Critically assess theological texts</li></ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                        |              |            |          |
| Module Content                 | The course will introduce the students to the concepts of textuality and method, studying classical definitions of theology from Gregory of Nyssa, Anselm and Aquinas through to, and concentrating on, more recent formulations of theology’s task from modern theologians such as Jurgen Moltmann, Elizabeth Johnson, and Willie James Jennings. The different methodological approaches to the study of religion will be introduced, and the different ways of conducting the task of theology will be too. In the course of the module, attention will be drawn to patterns of continuity or discontinuity, agreement and conflict in the texts studied. The purpose is to train students to integrate critical, conceptual and historical skills in the reading of theological texts. |                        |              |            |          |

| Module Learning Outcomes                 | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Distinguish between individual, social and professional ethics perspectives.</li><li>• Identify values and principles invoked and locate their philosophical and theological backgrounds.</li><li>• Identify, analyse and evaluate arguments and outcomes in contemporary cases and disputes.</li><li>• Argue for your own position by critically relating it to different traditions of ethical thinking.</li><li>• Trace similarities and differences between Ireland, Europe and international arguments (and conventions) in relation to these debates.</li></ul>                                                                         |                                                           |              |            |          |
| Module Content                           | The module will begin with a consideration of the nature of ethics argumentation and its application in contemporary contexts. Students will be introduced to schools of ethics in philosophy and theology (virtue, autonomy, utility, the common good), the scope and limits of obligations (cosmopolitan and communitarian), professional ethics, and national and international agreements and conventions, with examples drawn from across the globe: dam building in India; migration and displacement, international food security; sustainable transport; biodiversity conservation; ‘smart’ technologies; so-called artificial intelligence and the future of work; genetic ‘enhancement’ of future generations and ‘advance directives’ in dying. |                                                           |              |            |          |
| Teaching and Learning Format             | This module will be taught through a combination of lectures, student-led seminars, and debate.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                           |              |            |          |

| Module Learning Aims               | This module introduces students to the field of theological ethics as a branch of practical theology that explores how religious traditions interpret: moral principles, values in ethics and the good life. The first half of the course will familiarise students with sources and authority for theological reflection in ethics (scripture, tradition, reason, and experience), as well as foundational concepts in normative ethics. Students will engage a range of perspectives through both primary texts and key secondary sources. The second half of the module focuses on central themes in contemporary theological ethics, such as ecology, sexuality and gender identity, digital technologies, and economic justice. Students will be encouraged to think critically about how theological claims are formulated: in relation to interpretations of lived experience and theologies in the public realm. |

| Module Learning Aims     | This module familiarizes students with the variety of religious phenomena as they are embedded in their historical and cultural situation and with key concepts and debates of how to study them. Students will learn how to approach religion (and non-religion) through different perspectives; explore the relationships between the emergence of the Academic Study of Religion and the cultural history of Europe, colonialism, and globalisation; learn to apply approaches to empirical phenomena; acquire analytical skills and critical reading strategies when approaching religious and academic sources; develop a reflective and analytical approach to religion as culture.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Module Learning Outcomes | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Recognize and engage with religion as a cultural phenomenon in its various “lived” empirical, historical forms and media, locally and globally.</li> <li>• Present knowledge about the history of the Academic Study of Religion and its main theorists as entangled with the religious, political, colonial and cultural history of Europe</li> <li>• Identify, characterise and discuss key approaches to the academic study of religion.</li> <li>• Recognize and explain the multi-methodical structure of the discipline and distinguish different methodologies and perspectives.</li> <li>• Apply methods, analytical skills and approaches to empirical phenomena.</li> <li>• Critically reflect on their own concepts of, and their interest in religion and taking an analytical perspective on religious phenomena.</li> </ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Module Content           | Religion as a cultural reality is interrelated with possibly all aspects of human life, such as the formation of social communities, kin and gender relations; identity building; politics; healing practices; art and literature, and what counts as knowledge in a society. Hence, studying the role of religions in their cultural context requires a broad range of approaches and methods. We can see the Study of Religion in a broader sense as a study of worldviews more generally, and how humans make sense of their environment and themselves. After a critical introduction to the history of the Academic Study of Religion and its colonial, philosophical, and religious context the module gives an overview of the major approaches to the Study of Religion, both the “classical” approaches (sociology, anthropology, and psychology of religion) and more recently developed ones, such as the economy or the aesthetics of religion. Examples taken from different religious traditions and from the students’ own field observations provide the basis for exploring the relationships between religion and culture and how they are studied as an important factor of how humans live in a complex world. |

| Module Learning Aims                      | This module will introduce some of the key ideas, thinkers, and eras of philosophy. It will outline some of the main themes in philosophical thinking and show how they develop over time. The module will help sharpen critical thinking, conceptual rigour, and understanding of philosophical problems.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                 |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |               |                 |                                 |     |         |               |                 |                                 |     |         |

| Module Content                            | The module offers an overview of Western philosophy and analyses the questions treated in its main branches. Beginning with the Greeks as the founders of the Western philosophical tradition, key texts and ideas relating to Presocratic philosophers, Socrates, Plato and Aristotle will be studied with a particular emphasis on metaphysical questions about the nature of reality and of the soul. The medieval era will be studied primarily through the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas, with particular emphasis on his use of an Aristotelian approach to metaphysical notions of substance and soul, as well as his arguments for the existence of God. The study of modern philosophy will focus on Descartes, Hume, Kant, and Wittgenstein. In this part of the course, we will explore the views of these thinkers on questions like: What is knowledge, and is it possible? How is the mind related to the body? What is meant by virtue ethics? What is the relation between language and the world? Students will be taught how to critically engage with the various philosophical positions. |                                 |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |               |                 |                                 |     |         |               |                 |                                 |     |         |

| Module Content                            | This module introduces key social, cultural, and religious aspects of Jewish thought and practice from antiquity to our own time. The focus of this module is on Judaism as a major world religion that has shaped Western Civilization. Rabbinic textual traditions that underpin Jewish religious thought—especially the Mishnah, Talmud, and Midrashim—are explored. Calendar, festivals (esp. Day of Atonement, New Year, Festival of Booths, Passover, Hanukkah), and rites of passage (e.g., birth, circumcision, Bar/Bat Mitzvah, marriage, divorce, death) are studied both within the classroom as well as, when appropriate, in visits to local Jewish synagogues and museums. Contemporary Jewish movements and the history of their traditions come into view along with their different beliefs and practices (e.g., kashrut, Sabbath, worship, prayer). |               |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |             |            |               |     |   |       |            |       |     |    |

| Module Content                            | Why do some people consider animal sacrifice and ecstatic devotion as “Hinduism”, while others consider vegetarianism, non-violence, and meditation to be “Hinduism”? Why do some people regard Buddhism as a philosophy that rejects sexism and racism, while others see Buddhism as a religion that promotes inequality? This course introduces students to the history of Hinduism and Buddhism by reflecting on how and why “Hindu” and “Buddhist” identity has been constructed in various ways across time and place. The course is split into two halves. The first half covers Hinduism and the second half, Buddhism. In both sections, students will read primary sources from narratives, philosophy, and poems in premodern South Asia to maps, biographies, and lawsuits against academics from contemporary East Asia and America. Through an examination of these sources, students will not only be able to articulate the historically embedded debates that have led to the construction of Hindu and Buddhist identity, but they will also demonstrate an awareness of the theoretical questions that arise from studying Asian religions in a Western academic context. |              |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |                   |             |     |    |   |                   |             |     |    |    |

| Module Content                     | Jesus of Nazareth is one of the most influential figures in Western history, his name and teachings deeply woven into the fabric of global culture. While his morality has shaped countless societies, and his significance in Christian thought is immense, what can we really know about the historical figure who lived in first-century Palestine? This module takes an evidence-based, historical approach to uncovering the life of Jesus. We focus on the sources                                                                                                                                                                              |

|                                                  | that offer us glimpses of his existence, from the gospels of the New Testament to “lost” gospels and external references. Jesus has been portrayed in many ways: as a Cynic philosopher, social reformer, healer, apocalyptic prophet, and revolutionary. But which of these portrayals reflects the historical Jesus, and why are there so many competing images of him? We will investigate the so-called “Quests” for the historical Jesus, analyzing the methods and debates that have shaped our understanding of him. Students will learn how to critically examine ancient texts, both canonical and non-canonical, and engage with key historical questions that have puzzled scholars for centuries. Alongside the gospels, we explore other ancient writings, from the Gospel of Thomas to the Dead Sea Scrolls, in order to situate Jesus within the broader religious and cultural world of his time. Whether you are interested in early Christian texts, historical methods, or the impact of Jesus on later religious traditions, this module offers a historical investigation into the most enduring figure of the Western tradition. |                                    |                     |                   |                   |

| Module Learning Aims               | To introduce the students to the distinctive modes of theological expression found in the western medieval period. A particular aim is to develop an appreciation in students for the contribution of women to theology in this era.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                  |                     |                   |                   |
| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: 1. Compare and contrast the contributions of the monastic schools and that of the new universities to the development of Catholic theology. 2. Read and critically engage with primary texts of the period. 3. Evaluate the importance of the synthesis created by Aquinas for the formation of European thought. 4. Appraise the contribution of women to theology and ecclesial leadership in this era and their contribution to mystical theology. 5. Engage in independent research in this area.                      |                                                  |                     |                   |                   |
| Module Content                     | The purpose of this module is to survey the political, cultural and religious context in which Catholic theology developed in the medieval period. An important aim will be to introduce the student to some representative figures in the theology of the period. This period was particularly fruitful in the formation of theology in the Catholic tradition. The course will study: • The theology of the Monastic and Cathedral schools • The emergence of the University • The significance of Aquinas' work • The role of women in the medieval period • The early Irish medieval church |                                                  |                     |                   |                   |

| Module Content               | Drawing on primary sources, critical scholarship, ritual studies, and visual art, the course will devise a historical and theological framework in which to assess theoretical presuppositions and consequences of different interpretations of the person and work of Christ through the ages. The significance of Christology will be tested by analysing the doctrinal formulations of early, medieval, and modern Christianity and by discussing feminist, anti-racist, post-colonial, eco-activist, and queer interpretations of the figure of Christ. The relationship of various Christologies to current ethical issues, such as ecology, human rights, extreme poverty, disability inclusion, and anti-capitalism will be explored. The class is capped at 15 students; it will conduct up to half of its contact hours in the National Gallery of Ireland. |                                                        |               |            |          |

| Module Learning Aims               | This module aims to introduce and engage in contemporary scholarly reflection on critical animal studies, posthumanism, and ecotheology. It allows students to engage with theological perspectives on the definitions of “humanity,” “animality,” and “creatureliness.” Students will explore a number of theo-ethical topics in this area, from animal conservation to food.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

| Module Content                     | Ethics is written and studied by animals, you and me. Recent questions in ecological ethics swirl around “the question of the human” and “the question of the animal.” Theological and ethical concepts that define human beings as unique, with souls created imago dei, in the image of God with dominion over the planet are critiqued as being morally complicit with species decline, animal suffering, and habitat loss. On a planet undergoing the sixth great wave of animal extinction, this critique is no small matter. We’ll ask how we understand the human in relation to other nonhuman creatures that occupy the planet. We’ll think about animal ethics, the blurry lines between wild and domestic, human and nonhuman, living and extinct, veganism and vegetarianism, human and posthuman. We’ll ask how these conversations cause us to rethink theological understandings of “creatureliness” and “creation” and “kinship.” And we’ll ask how definitions of what it means to be “human” are already entangled in our theo-ethical and ecological concerns. |

| Module Learning Aims         | This module aims to allow students to explore and analyse the core issues and specific challenges related to how innovation can help achieve the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) through engaging with authentic cases from the Global South and Europe.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Module Learning Outcomes     | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Identify ways in which innovation (digital and non-digital) can potentially achieve the SDGs.</li> <li>• Understand and describe the challenges involved with leveraging technology and innovation to achieve the SDGs and make informed decisions about how to overcome these challenges.</li> <li>• Understand the benefits and problems associated with innovation to achieve the SDGs and learn how these are debated and resolved (or not) in specialist, multidisciplinary, and various socio-cultural environments.</li> <li>• Critically examine the ethical considerations surrounding innovation in various social, cultural, and political contexts.</li> <li>• Demonstrate effective presentation skills and the ability to work both individually and as part of multi-cultural and multi-disciplinary project team in a variety of learning environments.</li> </ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Module Content               | This module will introduce students to the key issues and current academic debates of relevance in a variety of fields, and also equip students with the knowledge and skills necessary to identify and manage these challenges in an appropriate and effective manner. The module will pay particular attention to the ethical issues involved with innovation for the SDGs, and critically examine the role played by social, political, cultural and human factors when designing, introducing and using technologies. This module therefore contributes to the broader programme outcomes related to ethics, reasoning, and moral inquiry. The module links most strongly with the SDGs which can be addressed by new, disruptive and innovative approaches and technologies. This module has a particular focus on the SDGs which can be addressed by smaller, community-level and citizen-led technology-based initiatives. Examples of this include designing innovative ways of leveraging the ubiquity of mobile phones in the Global South for healthcare and education, and the design, evaluation, and implementation of innovative techniques which are designed to be ethically, socially and culturally appropriate for their particular context. The module content includes relevant, authentic, situated cases from the Global South and Europe that have been developed specifically for the module. These multimedia-enhanced cases focus on projects from Ireland, India, Uganda, and Ethiopia. |

| Module Learning Aims               | The module introduces New Religious Movements as a contested yet vital element of global religious history. It aims at reflecting on how to study non-mainstream religion and provides students with knowledge about classical and contemporary debates on theorising religion. The focus lies on NRMs as part of a critical history of modernity and supports students in learning how to creatively interlink historical knowledge, theoretical thinking, and concrete empirical research methods. |
| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• characterise NRMs in their diverse historical development and as a field of research</li> <li>• identify key concepts in the contemporary academic study of religion</li> </ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

| Module Content               | This module combines two goals: it introduces students to the field of New Religious Movements developing from the 19th to the 21st century; and helps students to develop research skills for studying religion in all its appearances. Often labelled as ‘cults’ and ‘sects’, cases such as Scientology, modern Islamic groups, romantic Occultism or spiritual environmentalism bring up more general questions about how to study religion: How do religions evolve? Why did they emerge as a response to modernity, colonialism, and globalisation? Are these groups more ‘dangerous’ than traditional religions? What is the role of terms such as ‘doomsday cult’ in public discourse and cultural politics? By studying different aspects of these movements, students will become familiar with classical and contemporary approaches and will be able to analyse relations between religion and violence, gender, body politics, or the “invention of traditions”. They will choose a research case (either historical or contemporary) and will learn to apply different research methods and concepts. For students who find empirical work interesting, this module builds up skills that will help to develop a research question and choose a method as is required in the final dissertation. Be prepared to discuss also controversial themes and phenomena with an analytical attitude. |                      |                        |                       |            |          |           |                                                                                         |            |     |                       |       |                                                                   |            |     |                   |

|                                           | Israelite conquest, the stories of the Judges, the rise and fall of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah and the careers of royal figures such as David, Solomon, Hezekiah and Josiah. Reflection on the historiographical value of these traditions will be facilitated by situating them within the context of the material culture and historiographical traditions of the Ancient Near East, while particular emphasis will be paid to the interface of power and violence within the traditions.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                               |              |            |                            |

| Module Learning Aims                      | This module critically reviews a range of approaches to the question of God’s existence and nature, drawing both on the history of Christian theological reflection and on philosophy in the Western traditions                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |              |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |       |             |         |     |   |       |             |        |     |    |
| Module Learning Outcomes                  | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to:1. Critically examine the notion of natural theology.2. Demonstrate the possibilities and limitations of the so-called ‘proofs’ for the existence of God.3. Analyse the concept of divine revelation.4. Critically examine the appeal to experience in modern theology.5. Demonstrate the significance of religious language (e.g., myth, metaphor, symbol) for the theology of God.6. Articulate the distinctively modern and post-modern challenges to the theology of God. |              |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |       |             |         |     |   |       |             |        |     |    |
| Module Content                            | This module explores a number of key philosophical and theological landmarks in the debates about God in Christianity and western philosophy: does God exist? Is natural theology possible? What is meant by the notion of revelation? Is ‘religious language’ different to other language games?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |              |            |          |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |       |             |         |     |   |       |             |        |     |    |

| Module Learning Aims               | Cosmology traces developments in the mythological and natural-scientific study of the universe in its complex history. This module presents these developments as they have been interpreted from biblical, theological and philosophical perspectives, and the conditions under which these have been understood to conflict or converge with cosmologies and related anthropologies, from the natural sciences, particularly since the 16th century.                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Trace the biblical roots of models of origins and ends in models of creation.</li> <li>• Identify contrasting and rival philosophies and theologies of creation in the formulation of the doctrine of creation ex nihilo in early Christianity.</li> <li>• Name the impacts for theology and the natural sciences of the Galileo affair; developments in thermodynamics; models of the emergent universe; Darwinian evolution; new stories of the universe; and qualified teleologies in interpretations of how life works.</li> </ul> |

| Module Content                            | It explores how specific cosmologies emerged and in turn impacted on theology, science and culture, in astronomy, thermodynamics, emerging universe models, evolutionary theory and the return to narrative in the natural sciences. It includes implications for anthropology: the human person as created in the image of God ( imago Dei ); as embodied and free, contingent, and subject to frailty and failure ('sin'); as 'steward' of a habitable creation; and as inhabitant of the earthly cosmopolis .                                                                                                                                                                                                |                               |                     |                   |                 |

| Module Content                     | Beginning with an overview of traditions of ethics, this module treats two key areas of applied ethics. Sport in contemporary society has been described both as an expression of the highest human and social values, and as a legally secured parallel world of the elite pursuit of victories and medals. On the one hand, as a sphere of physical self-realization, social formation and of moral training in fairness, it is seen as an area with standards of excellence that can be closely aligned to ethics. On the other hand, individual sport stars and the institutions of organized sport have                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

| Module Content                     | This course takes Bollywood—with its glitzy dance-numbers, three-hour dramas, and dream-sequences—as a site for studying the representation of religion after India gained independence from British imperialism in 1947. Each week, we will watch examine one top-grossing Hindi film (w/eng subtitles) and examine how that film acts as a site in which religious                                                                                                                                                        |

In particular, we will explore the rise and representation of religious nationalism, secularism, pluralism, Hindu epics, and Muslim-Hindu relations through Hindi films. Each week is structured with one lecture and one seminar. The lecture will survey the political history of India as well as the history of Bollywood as they emerged in tandem with one-another in post-independence India. During the seminar, we will discuss the film first on its own terms and then in its historical context. Upon successful completion of this course, students will be able to triangulate the study of religion with the study of contemporary Indian history and film studies. |              |            |                             |  |                      |                        |              |            |          |                   |                                                                                          |     |      |                             |

| Module Content                     | Few figures have shaped the Western tradition as deeply, or as controversially, as Paul of Tarsus. His letters, written between 50 and 68 CE, are the earliest surviving Christian writings and provide a vivid window into the first generation of the Jesus movement. In this module, we examine Paul not as a theologian for later centuries but as a historical actor: a Jewish intellectual, Roman citizen, and community organizer navigating the social, religious, and political landscapes of the eastern Mediterranean. Was Paul a follower of Jesus or the founder of Christianity? What do his letters reveal about the challenges of building new communities, the tensions between cultural traditions, and the hopes and conflicts of early believers? We explore these questions using a range of historical tools, situating Paul’s writings in their ancient context and resisting retrospective theological interpretation. Students will engage critically with Paul’s major letters, paying attention to genre, rhetoric, and cultural background. The module focuses on Paul’s |

| Module Content               | This module represents an opportunity to explore the richness of the Wisdom Literature found in the Hebrew Bible and later Jewish traditions. Following an introduction to the Wisdom tradition, the module will offer a close and critical reading of the books of Proverbs, Job and Ecclesiastes and how wisdom themes have influenced other parts of the Hebrew canon. There will also be a focus on the divergent strands which emerge within this corpus and the historical context in which these works were produced. Seminar discussions will explore key themes such as divine justice, attitudes to wealth and work and the representation of women. The module will also consider the coherence of each individual book, the nature of the relationship between Hebrew wisdom and other sapiential traditions and will examine to what extent the Wisdom tradition diverges from other perspectives within the Hebrew Bible. |                               |                     |                   |                                        |

| Module Learning Aims               | The aim of this module is that students would exit with a complex understanding of issues of power in relation to theology. Through its course, students should gain a thorough understanding of theology's role in political movements in general and the conceptualisation of gender, race, class, sexuality, disability, protest and wealth in particular. |
| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Situate Christian Theology in Empire and in Modernity, particularly re: 'the rise of the subject'</li> </ul>                                                                                                                                    |

| Module Content                            | The Shoa/Holocaust meant that Theology could not carry on as it did before. Theology had to respond to this atrocity, to the “death of God” it brought, and to the demands of post-war churchgoers that theology offer a vision capable of preventing Christian collusion in such horrors in the future. This module will look at the ways that Modernity’s very tenets were revised in this theological effort in tandem with emergent theories of power, post-structuralism in particular. Then, it will examine Theology’s part in the emancipative political movements of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.                         |                                                              |                     |                   |                 |

| Module Learning Aims               | The aims of this module are: 1. To introduce students to the long tradition of theological reflection on being human in Christian sources.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Describe and discuss the importance of the Jewish heritage in Christian tradition.</li> <li>• Explain the importance of the concept of grace in Christian humanism.</li> <li>• Evaluate the different approaches to the theology of grace in the writings of St Paul, Augustine, Aquinas, and Luther.</li> <li>• Analyse the distinctive theological perspective on the interlocking complexity of evil in the human narrative.</li> <li>• Appraise issues in modern culture, such as human freedom, from a theological grace perspective.</li> <li>• Engage in independent research in this area.</li> </ul> |
| Module Content                     | This module studies what it means to be human from the perspective of theology. The study begins within the horizon of Jewish experience as articulated especially in the early chapters of the book of Genesis. The themes of the human reality as the Imago Dei, of sanctification, of deification, as well as the theme of deep-seated human alienation, are studied. In the Western tradition grace became a key concept in the articulation of the interplay of divine and human in history. The module studies its deployment through the centuries. Running through the module is the question, the debate, as to                                                                                                    |

| Module Learning Aims         | This module explores key concepts and debates in environmental and technology ethics: the commitments and values operative in models of sustainable development (theories of justice, capability and agency); questions of human populations (demographics, food production and security; sustainable transport; values at work in approaches to biodiversity conservation (wild, agricultural, urban); and conflicts and convergences in aiming for smart and sustainable cities.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Module Learning Outcomes     | On successful completion of the module students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Trace the value assumptions, commitments and principles at work in cases related to: biodiversity loss; food biotechnology; synthetic biology; intellectual property rights, older and emerging technologies for transport (cycling, drones) energy production and security; nature-based farming, and the value of work and human capabilities in the context of emerging AI (applied statistics)</li> <li>• Evaluate the integration of policy and regulation in Ireland, the EU and internationally</li> <li>• Argue for your position by critically relating it to different traditions of ethics (philosophical and theological) and civic debate in the public sphere</li> <li>• Demonstrate the ability to reconstruct arguments and value judgements in a poster, seminar and in written work</li> </ul> |
| Module Content               | This module explores key concepts and debates in environmental and technology ethics: productionism and the ‘tragedy of the commons’; instrumental versus intrinsic value; demographics and consumption; food security and related aspects of animal agriculture; justice and sustainable development; environmental citizenship and the possibilities for a habitable planet. It will examine key ethics responses rooted in hermeneutics, in philosophical and religious traditions (examples from Christianity, Islam, Buddhism and Daoism), in imagination (utopian fiction and fictions) and characterise the role of the ethicist in ‘expert’ cultures and in policy development in Ireland, the EU and internationally.                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

| Module Learning Aims               | This module introduces ways of studying and discussing the relationship between religion, media and the public sphere, the presence of religion in the media, and religion as an essentially mediated phenomenon. Students will be familiarized with studying religion through their media performances. Engaging in critical media research, students will develop research skills in studying the role of religion in the public sphere. These skills include critical media competence and the reflected usage of media when (re)presenting knowledge.                                                                         |
| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• distinguish, navigate and assess approaches to and the interaction between religion and media in historical perspective</li> <li>• conceptualise key terms (medium/media/mediation; religion; public sphere).</li> <li>• describe, analyse and discuss the role of mass media in the contemporary religious field; explain and interpret religious media performances as a lived cultural practice.</li> <li>• present and impart knowledge through media usage and develop a critical media competence.</li> </ul> |

| Module Content               | Religion is prominent in public debates, in the media, and in the cultural imaginary of people’s daily life, no matter whether they see themselves as believers or not. In turn, religions also ‘make use’ of media and mediation when creating influential symbols and intense and extraordinary experiences. They do so by means of architecture and music, images and narratives, through clothes, body practices or the TV and the internet. The module focuses on how the relationship between religion and media can be studied and how this helps to better understand how world views develop and change. This includes theoretical reflection on the “public sphere” as an element of modern democracies and the question whether we live in a “post-secular” world. Rethinking the concept of “media” will reach beyond social media and the mass media. Scripture and dance, money and microphones are means of mediation as well and an anthropology of media defines humans through their mediated relationship with reality. We will ask, what is a medium, how are religions depicted in the media, how do religions respond to new media, and how can religion be understood as mediation while often claiming to provide “immediate” experiences? Students will learn about the latest debates and analytical concepts and acquire study skills in the input phase, develop a case study over the course of the semester, and share their work-in-progress during a workshop phase to build up their final case study during term. |                      |                        |              |            |          |                     |                                                    |      |     |     |                |                                                                                             |       |     |      |                |                                                                |         |     |             |

| Module Content                     | Welcome to the world of Hindu Mythology where everything is turned up-side down. Demons are virtuous. Gods are powerless. Everyone shape-shifts. And women dictate the trajectory of the universe. How and why do ancient Hindus describe the world we inhabit in this way?                                                                                                                                                                    |

|                                                  | This course surveys the history of Sanskrit Hindu Mythology from its inception in the Vedic period (1000 BCE) to its height in Sanskrit Epics and Purāṇas (1000 CE). Students will explore how premodern Hindu writers used such myths to navigate key religious themes: the problem of evil; power and sovereignty; gender and sexuality; love and war; and body politics. This module is assessed through creative writing. You will be asked to re-write any Hindu myth from our course by applying and updating concepts and methods used by Hindu storytellers. |                                                                                 |                     |                   |                      |

Critically appraise the theological response to the Enlightenment provided by F. Schleiermacher and post-Romantic liberalism</li> <li>6. Investigate the new conditions of knowledge and the foundations of ethics posed with the anthropological turn in their relevance for theology in the 19th and 20th centuries.</li> </ol> |
| Module Content               | This module explores the new theological paradigms associated with the European Christian Reformations of the sixteenth century and the Enlightenment, setting them in the context of the nominalist challenge to the grand synthesis of faith and reason associated with the scholastic achievements of the thirteenth century. Debates over the justification of the sinful human person, and the wide-ranging consequences of theological anthropology frame the ecclesiological, social and political consequences of the Reformations, to which the ethical concerns of the Enlightenment's concern with autonomous human reason were a response. The module concludes with an analysis of theological efforts to reformulate the tasks of theology in a post-Enlightenment context.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

| Module Learning Outcomes           | On successful completion of this module, students should be able to: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. Demonstrate critical understanding of how artistic interpretations of Moses/the Exodus relate to the biblical text.</li> <li>2. Evaluate the influence of aesthetic trends and specific artistic influences on artistic representations of Moses/the Exodus</li> <li>3. Analyze how religious contexts and institutions and socio-economic factors shape interpretations of Moses/the Exodus in the Arts.</li> <li>4. Recognise how intermediality shapes the interpretation of Moses/the Exodus in the Arts.</li> <li>5. Reflect critically on scholarly discussion of the artistic interpretation of Moses/the Exodus and express their own opinions.</li> </ol>                                                                     |
| Module Content                     | The student will be introduced to the afterlives of Exodus and the Moses traditions within and beyond the biblical tradition. Critical scrutiny of the reception and interpretation of selected texts and works of art (of various forms) from antiquity to the present, in a diversity of religious traditions will help to illuminate how and why biblical traditions have been and continue to be reflected and refracted in various ways in the literary arts (e.g. poetry), visual arts (e.g. painting, stained glass), performing arts (e.g. theatre, opera) and cinematic arts (e.g. film). Attention will be paid to aesthetic trends, specific artistic influences, religious and ecclesial contexts and socio-economic factors as we grapple with the complex phenomenon of the reception of the Hebrew Bible/Old Testament in these works. |

| Module Learning Aims                      | This module has two core aims: 1. that students might realise the importance and the complexity of truth-telling for human society; 2. that students might demonstrate critical reading and thinking skills.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |              |            |      |  |                      |                        |              |            |      |       |       |  |     |    |  |                                   |  |  |    |

| Module Learning Outcomes                  | On successful completion of this module students should be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Read, value and critique selected primary texts and authors.</li><li>• Communicate with confidence, both orally and written, critical knowledge of primary texts and authors.</li><li>• Understand the rich depths of truth-telling as theological virtue.</li></ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |              |            |      |  |                      |                        |              |            |      |       |       |  |     |    |  |                                   |  |  |    |
| Module Content                            | This module, rooted in an understanding of truth-telling as a virtue closely aligned to the virtue of justice (Thomas Aquinas), will explore the complexity of truth-telling interacting with locutors such as Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Elizabeth Anscombe, Immanuel Kant, Hannah Arendt. It will consider what it means to say 'God is truth', to describe Jesus Christ as the truth, and to speak of the Eucharist as the 'food of truth' and the implications of these theological statement. Fundamentally we shall consider whether Christian faith has insights to bring to the political arena, insights that might be helpful to all. |              |            |      |  |                      |                        |              |            |      |       |       |  |     |    |  |                                   |  |  |    |

| Module Content                     | Discovered by Bedouin shepherds in the Judean desert beginning in 1947, the Dead Sea Scrolls rank among the most extraordinary finds of the modern era. They preserve a vast archive of ancient Jewish texts offering an unparalleled glimpse into the diversity of thought and practice in the Second Temple period. These manuscripts have reshaped our understanding of early Judaism and the world from which Christianity emerged. This module introduces students to the contents, controversies, and contexts of the Scrolls. We explore the archaeology of Qumran, the scribal practices evident in over 900 manuscripts, and the complex question of who lived near the caves. We also delve into modern issues: the ethics of manuscript acquisition, the problem of forgeries in museum collections, and how digital imaging and AI-driven tools are transforming Scrolls research today. |

|                                                  | Students will engage directly with key compositions (e.g., the Community Rule, the Hodayot, and the War Scroll) while developing critical skills in manuscript analysis, genre identification, and historical contextualization. By the end of the semester, students will be equipped to situate the Scrolls within broader debates about ancient identity, authority, and the interpretation of sacred texts.                                                                                                        |                               |                     |                   |                    |  |

| Module Learning Aims     | The aim of this module is to analyze and discuss the relationship between religion and modernity and how we can best understand the role of religion today. It traces the radical critique of concepts such as secularization and modernization as outcomes of a colonial, Eurocentric history, and introduces alternative possibilities. These debates will be tested by studying empirical cases, demonstrating that religion and modernity interact in many, often unexpected ways around the world.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

| Module Content           | The relationship between Religion and Modernity has been a contested field of debate, and given the fast pace of changes in all areas of cultural life, it is even questioned how we should identify the era in which we live, and what role religion plays in it: is it modernity, late, post, or meta-modernity? And should we still use this model at all, realizing the Eurocentric ideas that are connected with it? And what does this mean for how we write a History of Religion in Modernity? Over a long time, Western scholarship expected religion to decline or even vanish in the course of modernization and that global developments would follow the “Western model”. However, from the 1970s on it became clear that secularization rather meant pluralization, and that pluralization not necessarily means a loss or decline of religion, but a change of form and function: diverse modernities became visible, including authoritarian forces that work against pluralism as an element of a “world society”. Taking S. Eisenstadt’s concept of “Multiple Modernities as a vantage point, we will explore areas of social transformation, and how to discover religion as a vital part of these dynamic changes. Phenomena such as the rising Pentecostalism in the Americas and Africa, controversies around religious symbols in the public sphere, new links between | religion and political populism, “new spirituality” as well as “new atheism” and religiously embedded terrorism made clear that no simple explanation would help to understand the complexity of the changing roles of religion in recent history. Seeking to develop models of explanation, scholars offered a variety of concepts and ideas, some comparing our time with the ancient period of the so-called Axial Age, when the major religions of today began to develop.

We will take a closer look at these concepts and the arguments they put forward. They will lead us to studying “religion as relations”, addressing cases from diverse fields and cultural areas:

- how religion interacts with social transformations, as a political power and a means of protest
- how religious feminism can be conservative and innovative at the same time
- how science and art interact with religion
- how the religious and the secular are at the centre of how we see the modern
- how religion diffuses into popular culture and the media
- how death and dying in modern societies creates religious and secular responses
- how Occultism and Esotericism interact with modernity
- how thinkers of modernity made religion a core theme
- how religion shifted from dogma and belief to feeling and embodied experience

Cases may vary and can be adapted to students’ interests.

| Module Learning Aims               | This module aims to ground students in the theological understanding of the body and the ascetic traditions through which it was disciplined, from patristic and medieval Christianity to the secularising turn of modernity. It further aims to equip them with contemporary asceticism as an analytical framework, and to test its application across five contemporary domains in which the body remains a site of meaning-making and moral formation. |

| Module Content               | The body in the Christian tradition – drawing on its classical and Judaic heritage – was considered as both entity to be disciplined and sacred as being configured imago Dei. This complex notion of the body was traditionally negotiated through the practice of asceticism: askēsis as training and discipline of the body toward an end beyond itself. That settlement is unsettled by secularisation, which is often assumed to mark the decline of religion and ethical authority in the West. What remains under-theorised is how ethical formation continues in societies where religious belief has lost authority without being replaced by a single, coherent secular moral framework. Rather than understanding asceticism as a uniquely Christian practice, this module approaches it as a recurring mode of ethical formation in which bodily discipline is used to pursue meaning, identity, transcendence or moral transformation. It asks whether contemporary Western culture has abandoned asceticism—or merely relocated it into practices such as wellness culture, restrictive eating practices, gender transition, transhumanist optimisation and forms of climate activism. These are examined not simply as social phenomena but as symbolic attempts to impose structure, identity and meaning upon the body in a polarised and rapidly changing world. The five case studies reflect overlapping arenas in which the body remains central to contemporary ethical and cultural debates. Each case study draws on primary theological, scientific and cultural texts to explore how practices of embodied meaning-making evolve under different historical and social pressures. For example, might embodied climate protest be understood as a secular form of prophecy or martyrdom? Anorexia nervosa as a postmodern echo of medieval mysticism? Or transhumanism as a yearning for transcendence reinterpreted through secular individualism? |

| Module Content               | From the 1800’s up until the present day, academics have spilled much ink trying to find the so-called origin of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism. But what is at stake in trying to identify the “origin” of such traditions? Can we talk about “origins”? Can we even talk about “Hinduism” “Buddhism” and “Jainism” as distinct religious identities? In order to answer these questions, this course surveys the history of Hinduism, Buddhism and Jainism in South Asia through the earliest available textual and material evidence from 7000 BCE to 200 CE. Each week, we will read sources that (supposedly!) articulate the “origin” of key religious terms, debates, and identities in Ancient India. In doing so, we will reflect on the content, method, and theory for the study of Ancient Indian religions. In terms of content, this course interrogates the claim that “Hinduism”, “Buddhism” and “Jainism” arose independently of one-another. We will, instead, explore when and how South Asian communities began to distinguish themselves through dialogical interaction with one-another before the common era. In terms of method, this course challenges the idea that we can recover the history of Ancient Indian religions through a single religion or medium. We will read across the boundaries of religious identities, as well as across the boundary between textual and archaeological evidence to recover the dynamic past of India. Finally, in terms of the history of the study of religion, we will reflect on the impact that the search for “origins” in India has had in the academy writ large. |                                                                                |              |            |                            |
