The Role of Reflection in Family Support Social Work and Its Possible Promotion by a Research-Supported Model

Jennie Ryding and Inga Wernersson

Department of Social and Behavioural Studies, University West, Trollhättan, Sweden

ABSTRACT

Purpose: There is a prevailing controversy over the use of evidence-based practice (EBP) within human-service organizations. Since it is argued that it is a threat to reflection, proven experience, and tacit knowledge, we wanted to investigate the impact of the research-supported, family-centered model Family Check-Up (FCU) on practitioners' use of, and opportunities for, reflection.

Method: Focus group interviews with family support social workers trained in FCU ( $n = 19$ ) were conducted.

Results: The significance of reflection for social work practice is clearly indicated. It is crucial for providing quality care: for making progress, processing cases, and effecting change in client-related work. Described as a coping-mechanism, it is also crucial for practitioners. Since various elements of FCU require practitioners' reflective ability, it was argued that it promotes both reflection and professional learning.

Discussion: Rather than constituting a threat to reflection, FCU was seen as promoting it, indicating an inaccuracy in prevailing assumptions about research-supported models. This implies the need for revising the definition of such models to promote their potential use and benefits. Working with FCU, however, demands sufficient resources.
