Module Learning Aims and Outcomes:

On successful completion of this module, you will be able to:

- Discuss sociological explanations of political processes
- Relate this theoretical understanding to empirical data and analyses for more than two advanced democracies.
- Compare and contrast competing approaches in the field
- Relate concepts and theories to current political challenges in Ireland.

Module Content:

Political sociology is concerned with the social bases of politics and the relationship between states and societies. Through examining the nature of power, states and the policy process, this course provides sociological insights into the world of politics, policy and social change.

This module introduces students to the major ideas and debates within the field of political sociology and provides them with some of the tools needed to analyse power, politics and the state. In particular, it examines interactions between economic interests, political institutions, and ideological norms. The module has equally strong theoretical and empirical components and aims to expand students' knowledge of society and politics in a number of countries. Topics include power, the nature of the state, institutional change, the organization and representation of interests, gender and social policy and nations and immigration.
